

■ The Legend of the Unicorns of the Sea

Long, long ago, when the world was still young and the Arctic Ocean was filled with whispers of magic, there lived a group of snowy white whales who loved to play beneath the shimmering northern lights. They were gentle, curious creatures who sang songs that made the ice sparkle and the stars dance.

One winter, a terrible storm swept across the sea. The waves crashed high, and the wind howled so loudly that even the bravest whales hid beneath the ice. But one young whale—smaller than the rest—heard a cry for help. It was a unicorn, stranded on a floating piece of ice, far from land! The unicorn's horn was broken, and she was weak from the cold.

Without thinking twice, the little whale swam to her and said, "Climb onto my back! I'll carry you to safety." Together they dove under the waves, traveling for many days until they reached a quiet, sheltered cove where the unicorn could rest. As a thank-you, the unicorn touched the whale's forehead with the tip of her broken horn. "For your bravery and kindness," she said, "I give you a gift—a piece of my magic to keep forever."

When the unicorn's horn touched the whale, it began to glow! From that day on, the little whale and all his descendants grew long, spiral tusks that shimmered just like a unicorn's horn. The other sea creatures were amazed. They called them narwhals—the unicorns of the sea!

And if you ever sail in the far Arctic and see a silvery tusk breaking through the icy waves, remember this story. Maybe, just maybe, a little unicorn magic still lives beneath the northern lights. ■
